When the Los Angeles Clippers' Chris Paul signed a seven-year, $131 million deal on Sunday, the market for point guards in free agency was set on fire. Chris Paul is, for better or worse, the face of the sport. His impact on basketball will no doubt be measured in dollars, by the number of basketballs sold and, perhaps most important, by the number of NBA teams going after him. The market for centers is different, but still just as volatile. While big men are measured in dollars, such as the contract Kevin Durant got in free agency last summer, they are often measured by intangibles like intimidation, defensiveness and, yes, intimidation. The NBA is a game where stars win championships, and while a roster featuring LeBron James or Kevin Durant could win a title, it could also be dominated in terms of ball movement and shot selection. In terms of trading for centers, the most important question is how successful teams are at creating mismatches. According to Synergy Sports, the Warriors have attempted the second-most passes per game of all the teams in the NBA since last season, but they've done so with Andrew Bogut and Draymond Green as the primary creators. Houston, a playoff team, is the same. The same can be said for the Lakers, and for the Hawks, a team whose foundational moves have included the trade for Al Horford. They both made the playoffs, and most importantly, they were
